CABBAGE TREE PORCELAIN DIPPING BOWLS

The cabbage tree is one of the most distinctive trees in the New Zealand landscape, especially on farms. They grow all over the country, but prefer wet, open areas like swamps.

Growing 12 to 20 metres high, cabbage trees (Cordyline australis) have long narrow leaves that may be up to a metre long. It has lovely, scented flowers in early summer, which turn into bluish-white berries that birds love to eat.

Māori used cabbage trees as a food, fibre and medicine. The root, stem and top are all edible, a good source of starch and sugar. The fibre is separated by long cooking or by breaking up before cooking. The leaves were woven into baskets, sandals, rope, rain capes and other items and were also made into tea to cure diarrhoea and dysentery.

Made from white porcelain, inside semi-gloss clear glaze with decal and unglazed outside.

These pieces feature irregularities in both shape and form; this is part of the organic nature of the collection.

FLAX BUSH PORCELAIN DIPPING BOWLS

Harakeke was the name given to this plant by Māori. The first European traders called it 'flax' because its fibres were similar to that of true flax found in other parts of the world. Although, we still call it flax today, harakeke is really a lily.

Flax is unique to New Zealand and is one of our most ancient plant species. There are two identified species of flax in New Zealand - common flax (harakeke) and mountain flax (wharariki). We all recognise the tall, green, sword-like leaves of flax that can be found growing throughout New Zealand. Common flax is found throughout the country, especially in wet areas, while mountain flax is found both at higher altitudes and along exposed coastlines.

TOETOE PORCELAIN DIPPING BOWLS

The giant tussock grasses of toetoe, sporting numerous large creamy flower plumes on tall stems, are an iconic part of the New Zealand landscape. Most New Zealanders would be familiar with toetoe, perhaps having played with the flowering stems as a child, but might be surprised to learn that toetoe is actually five discrete, but similar looking, species each with marked differences in distribution.

The major traditional use for toetoe was to line the inner walls, roofs, and partitions of houses and other buildings with the stems (culms) called kākaho, producing a neat finish. The hollow culms were also used as shafts for hunting arrows, straws and pipes, spears in games, and frames for kites.

Kākaho are still used in tukutuku panels, the ornamental lattice-work put around the walls of meeting houses. The vertical stakes are traditionally made of kākaho culms, with horizontal rods of bracken stalks or strips of tōtara, and a pattern woven among them of harakeke, kiekie or pingao.

Leaves were sometimes used for weaving mats and baskets, after first removing the sharp leaf margins.

Made from white porcelain, inside semi-gloss clear glaze with decal and unglazed outside.

FERN FROND PORCELAIN DIPPING BOWLS

The unfurling fern frond, which is the design featured in this bowl, is symbolic of the everlasting cycle, growing friendship and an ever-closer bonding.

The koru (Māori for "loop") is a spiral shape based on the shape of a new unfurling silver fern frond and symbolizing new life, growth, strength and peace. It is an integral symbol in Māori art, carving and tattoos. The circular shape of the koru helps to convey the idea of perpetual movement while the inner coil suggests a return to the point of origin.

The koru is used in a stylised form as the logo of Air New Zealand and as an iconic symbol of New Zealand flora.

These bowls are made from white porcelain, inside semi-gloss clear glaze with decal and unglazed outside and shown in irregular shape and form; part of the organic nature of the collection.

The fern, which is the design featured in this bowl, has been adopted as a national symbol of New Zealand. Widely recognized worldwide, the Silver Fern is representative of New Zealand and its people. It is an image to which all New Zealanders relate and is a powerful and emotional symbol of inspiration.

The silver fern, which grows as far as 45 degrees south, takes its name from the light under side of the fronds which can be used as a signpost for travelers in the bush with the tips pointing the way.

PAUA BOWL

A décor, holder for your bits and pieces or a lovely piece to add to your collection.

Pāua is the Māori name given to three New Zealand species of large edible sea snails, marine gastropod mollusks which belong to the family Haliotidae (in which there is only one genus, Haliotis). Pāua are commonly found in shallow coastal waters along rocky shorelines in depths of 1 to 10 m.

To Māori, pāua are recognised taonga, or treasure, esteemed both as kaimoana (seafood) and as a valued resource for traditional and contemporary arts and crafts. Pāua are frequently used to represent eyes in Māori carvings and traditionally are associated with the stars or whetū, the symbolic eyes of ancestors that gaze down from the night sky. Highly polished New Zealand pāua shells are extremely popular as souvenirs with their striking blue, green, and purple iridescence. Empty shells are often used as ashtrays.

KAWAKAWA POD BOWLS

The name Kawakawa in Māori refers to the bitter taste of the leaves, from kawa bitter.

Kawakawa is a traditional medicinal plant of the Māori. An infusion is made from the leaves or roots, and used for bruises, to relieve pain or toothache, or as a general tonic. The sweet edible yellow berries (most often found in summer on female trees) of the plant were eaten as a diuretic.

This is a great addition to the range, and we are sure this different shape and clever detail will also be a real winner.

PUKA BOWL

Meryta sinclairii, the puka or pukanui, is a large-leaved evergreen tree endemic to New Zealand that grows to about 8 m tall, with the distinctly tropical appearance typical of the genus. There are about 27 species of Meryta, all small, resinous trees of the subtropical and tropical Pacific Ocean.

Puka occurs naturally on the Three Kings Islands and the Hen and Chickens Islands where it occurs in greater abundance in the relatively sheltered valleys, where soils are thick and conditions are relatively moist, rather than on the exposed ridge-tops. However, puka can also grow on cliffs with shallow, stony soils which suggests some tolerance of drought.

TAPA PLATTER

Tapa is the word associated with Pacific bark cloth. It is made from the pounded inner bark of various trees, such as the paper mulberry and breadfruit. Each island group has its own uses for tapa, applying unique patterns to represent distinctive concepts. Frangipani flowers are a favorite feature with their rich colour and symmetric curves.

KORU PLATE

In Māori design, the Koru has a dual meaning. It is commonly used in Māori art as a symbol of creation.

It is also said to represent new life and in business, new beginnings and the strengthening of existing relationships.

Literally speaking, the baby fern frond slowly unwinds over its adolescent life as it grows into a mature frond. It then opens into a brand-new leaf on the silver fern plant where it ages and then dies. This is the fern fronds life cycle.

You will notice the Koru is carved “clockwise”. Traditionally known as “sunwise circling”, it represents good luck. This is because to move sunwise is to be in harmony with the earth’s movement around the sun.

TRIANGLE POHUTUKAWA PLATE

The Pohutukawa has a bright red blossom, which appears near the end of December and lasts for several months. For that reason, it is known as the New Zealand Christmas Tree. The Maori believe that the pohutukawa blossom predicts whether the coming summer will be long and hot, or shorter and cooler.

WAVY SQUARE FERN PLATE

The Silver Fern was originally adopted by the New Zealand Native Rugby Team which visited England in 1888 and has since formed part of the uniform (or badge) of successive representative sporting teams. From the early 1900s, the fern leaf has been used as a trademark for meat and dairy exports. There is no question that the Silver Fern is the most recognized symbol of New Zealand. For over a century, it has been the emblem of our sports men and women. It is used extensively as a symbol by Government, tourism, trade organizations and commercial brands. The SILVER FERN says "New Zealand".

WAKA HUIA

The Waka Huia (Feather Box) was the treasure box of a chief or a family group.

Waka Huia were originally used for holding ceremonial items or valued treasures and the long tail feathers of the Huia bird. The tail feathers were used to adorn the hair of Māori chiefs - hence this is where the name is derived from.

Combs for the hair, tiki, greenstone and bone ornaments, valued feathers and other small treasures were all retained in the papahou under a very special tapu. The box was suspended from a rafter of a chief's sleeping hut or kept in one of those small whatu rangi upheld by a single pole of considerable length.

HEI MATAU

The new age understanding of the design is that it represents strength, good luck, and safe travel across water. The fishhook shape of the hei matau finds its origins in Māori legend, which holds that the North Island of New Zealand was once a huge fish that was caught by the great mariner Maui using only a woven line and a hook made from the jawbone of his grandmother. The fishhook denotes the importance of fishing to the Maori people of New Zealand, and their strong relationship to Tangaroa, the god of the sea.

FERN FROND

The unfurling fern frond is symbolic of the everlasting cycle, growing friendship and an ever-closer bonding. The koru (Māori for "loop") is a spiral shape based on the shape of the new silver fern shoot and symbolizing new life, growth, strength and peace. It is an integral symbol in Māori art, carving and tattoos. The circular shape of the koru helps to convey the idea of perpetual movement while the inner coil suggests a return to the point of origin.

The koru is used in a stylized form as the logo of Air New Zealand and as an iconic symbol of New Zealand flora.

KINA

This kina is a distinctive display piece. It is a pale green, knobby and frail shell found washed up on beaches in Taranaki and around New Zealand

Kina shelter under and around rocks by day and come out to feed at night. Tube feet enable them to move in any direction and help to guide food towards their mouth on the underside of the shell. They can be traced back in fossil records to very early forms of life and are unlike any other modern animal.

PAUA

Wall objects that celebrate what every Kiwi that loves the beach loves, our Kai Moana.

PAUA is a shellfish indigenous to the South Pacific waters surrounding New Zealand. As a unique type of abalone, paua has become a "taonga" (treasure) to the New Zealand people and the shells are often used for decorative effect. The Maori people have had a long tradition of gathering paua for its nutritional and aesthetic qualities.

The shell has an iridescent blue-green interior and is widely used for jewellery and ornaments. It is found in rock crevices at extreme low tide.

SCALLOP

Perhaps the most sought after of all shellfish, scallops are fantastic eating. They are a classic bivalve (two shells) with a flat valve and a concave valve. They have a strong adductor muscle (the white bit) that they use to open and close their shells. By closing their shells, they jet out a stream of water that allows them to swim. The roe (the red bit) and the muscle are the parts most commonly eaten. Scallops become fertile at about one year old when they reach about 60mm across -- www.wildblue.co.nz)

OAMARU STONE KORU SCULPTURE

This Oamaru Stone sculpture is carved in one of the traditional Koru designs representing the coiled spring of the emerging fern leaf, symbolizing new life, new growth and new beginnings.

Oamaru Stone is known to Geologists as Totara Limestone and was formed some 35 - 40 million years ago. Over millions of years, the soft sediment became lithified (hardened into rock) and was eventually lifted above sea level.
