TOKI POU TANGATA

(Chief's Ceremonial Adze)

Toki is Māori for adze, Tangata means a Māori person

Māori Wood Carvings are very distinctive and well recognised internationally. These traditionally styled and beautifully made wood carvings are all hand carved from indigenous timber and New Zealand Pounamu.

A Toki Pou Tangata is a ceremonial adze worked from pounamu (New Zealand Jade) and lashed to a finely carved wooden handle.

Toki Pou Tangata were carried by a person of mana (prestige), high rank, and great leadership qualities. Perhaps the nearest equivalent in European culture is the sceptre, used by kings as a symbol of rank and power.

The Presentation Gift Boxes have been specially designed to not only enhance the Adze but also to protect it well in transit.

TOKI KAKA POTO (Māori Pounamu Axe)

Introduced by the early European settlers in the early 1800's, the steel-headed axe was soon adopted by the Māori. Their axe was made by lashing a pounamu head, (which had been ground down to a cutting edge), to a carved wooden handle with flax. These axes were used to fell trees and to hollow and shape the waka taua – war canoes.

TAIAHA

(pronounced Tie-uh-ha)

A Taiaha was a traditional spear of the Māori of New Zealand.

The original Taiaha was consisted of the tinana (body), an upoko (head) and an arero (tongue) which comes out of the head. It was adorned with a collar of kākā feathers and hair from a kuri (Polynesian dog). The purpose of the collar was both to add to the beauty of the weapon and to distract the wielder's opponent during battle.

The Taiaha is widely known due to its use in the wero — the traditional Māori challenge during the pōwhiri, a formal welcoming ceremony. A wero is commonly given to heads of state and visiting dignitaries welcomed to New Zealand.

Individual displays of weaponry expertise were often performed during the wero ceremony (ritual challenge to a party of visitors). In full view of the visiting party, a selected warrior would parry invisible blows and strike down unseen foes. He would then lay down a taki (symbol of peace), which was picked up by the visitors, and the welcoming ceremony would continue. Such weaponry displays still occur today during large and important Māori gatherings. Usually, the wero is performed by a lone warrior, but during special events, there might be as many as three. This unique demonstration of Māori weaponry remains part of modern Māori society.

The Taiaha is one of many cultural items which are used to introduce children in school to Māori culture. They are also used in present-day kapa haka competitions, and training with the taiaha is seen as part of the Māori cultural revival.

WAKA TAU ON STAND

Traditional Māori Canoe

Wakas were the traditional ocean-going canoes that bore the first Māori to New Zealand. The Waka has strong links with personal and tribal identity – naming one's ancestral Waka is an important part of identifying genealogy for Māori descendants. The Wakas/canoes could be up to 100 feet long. They were crafted from a combination of 40,000-year-old Genesis Kauri, Tawa and NZ Rimu. The stern has a carved human figure at its base and the stern, prow and side panels were ornately carved including Kauri filigree and Paua inlay reflecting the style of the particular tribe. Only men of rank worked upon these canoes which were traditionally paddled by up to 100 warriors.

POUNAMU MERE

Taonga ("Treasure") and a Symbol of Courage and Determination

The mere is a type of short, broad-bladed weapon in the shape of an enlarged tear drop. It was usually made from nephrite jade (pounamu or greenstone). A mere is one of the traditional, hand to hand, one-handed weapons of the indigenous Māori of New Zealand, and a symbol of chieftainship.

Pounamu was highly prized by Maori and the mere pounamu as the weapon of a chief or rangatira, was the most revered of all Maori weapons. These mere were passed through generations; they were given names, and were said to possess a spiritual quality or mana of their own. Particularly special mere was imbued with magical powers, or supernatural qualities. Due to the high value placed on revered mere pounamu they would often be hidden when not in use and kept in specially constructed cases. Considerable efforts were undertaken, often by an entire tribe, to recover or regain significant mere that were lost or stolen. Mere were buried with their chiefly owners but were considered so valuable that they were later recovered from the grave during the second burial.

Pounamu mere became symbols of power and influence that they were exchanged between the tribes. A mere might be presented to another tribe in return for land or Waka, as a peace offering or a seal of marriage. Mere have names and from each exchange they gain their history and mana.

Gifting such a valuable item was common as a sign of good faith and it retains this symbolic importance today.

WAKA STERN (Taurapa)

The taurapa carvings represent the story of Tāne (god of forests and birds) ascending the twelve heavens to obtain the three baskets of knowledge - kete tuauri (basket of peace, goodness, and love), kete tūātea (basket of prayer, incantations, and ritual), and kete aronui (basket of war, agriculture, wood, stone, and earth work) - in order to learn the secrets of life. On the way, his elder brother Whiro (evil) tries, unsuccessfully, to disrupt Tāne's journey.

The more elaborately carved taurapa would have a manaia or avian-like creature seen grappling with the two vertical rib forms representing the creative principles of life. The manaia is biting down on the tops of the two ribs, which represent ira-atua (the gods) and ira-tangata (humankind). The manaia is therefore symbolically battling the opposing notions of war and peace. The surrounding spiral system is called pitau meaning perforated spiral carving.

To carve a waka taua took great skill, and canoe-makers acquired great mana (prestige) and reputations as priests and craftsmen for their ritual and technical expertise. These qualities were seen as inseparable and would have been highly desirable in the construction of waka taua, which were imbued with spiritual significance during the transportation of warriors over great distances.

WAKA HUIA

The Waka Huia (Feather Box) was the treasure box of a chief or a family group.

Waka Huia were originally used for holding ceremonial items or valued treasures and the long tail feathers of the Huia bird. The tail feathers were used to adorn the hair of Māori chiefs - hence this is where the name is derived from.

Combs for the hair, tiki, greenstone and bone ornaments, valued feathers and other small treasures were all retained in the papahou under a very special tapu. The box was suspended from a rafter of a chief's sleeping hut or kept in one of those small whatu rangi upheld by a single pole of considerable length.
